

New Homecoming activity offers chance to have lunch with local business leaders

Are you interested in discussing your career goals over lunch with a person already in your field?

The Take a Duck to Lunch program, a new Homecoming activity this year, allows students to get a more personal view of their career fields by spending lunch with a community businessperson who works in a related field.

About 40 students have signed up for the program already, says Mona Buckley, student coordinator of the program.

"It's a good opportunity, and lots of people have shown interest. The business community especially has really gotten into it," Buckley says.

The goal of the program is not only to give students a connection with their career fields but also to promote good public relations for the University, Buckley says.

"We want the business community to know that there really are some decent students here," she says.

Businesspeople will contact students for lunch sometime during Homecoming week, Oct. 22-27.

Applications are available in the Alumni Office, Room 221 Johnson Hall. The program is open to all interested students, and applications are due Wednesday at noon.
