Study finds fewer Pell Grants go to Western college students

By Scott McFetridge
Of the Emerald

Although the 14 Western states enroll about 25 percent of the nation's higher education students, the federal government gave only about 15 percent of the Pell Grant awards to Western students in the 1983-84 school year, according to a study published in a recent issue of The Chronicle of Higher Education.

The study, compiled by the Western Interstate Commission for Higher Education, reported that about $409 million in Pell Grants were awarded to Western students in the 1983-84 academic year. If Western students had been awarded as many Pell Grants as the nationwide percentage, they would have received $280 million more, the study stated.

The reason for the disparity appears to be the lower cost of higher education in the Western states and the higher per capita earnings of Western families, according to the study. The Oregon State System of Higher Education had the second highest tuition rates of public colleges in the West during 1983-84.

The study also showed that an increasing number of Pell Grants are being awarded to students enrolled in vocational training schools. Students in these schools, which train students in areas such as business, cosmetology and computer programming, were more than twice as likely to receive Pell Grants as students enrolled in colleges or universities, the study showed.

Students enrolled in these short-term programs received 13 percent of Pell Grant funds during the 1983-84 academic year — nearly double the amount awarded several years earlier.

Although an increasing number of Pell Grants are being awarded to vocational students, fewer of the grants are going to students enrolled in two-year and four-year institutions. Students from these colleges and universities received 67 percent of the Pell Grants in the 1974-75 academic year but received only 56 percent in the 1983-84 school year, the study stated.

These statistics indicate that the neediest students are increasingly turning to short-duration vocational programs, the study reported.

has not been enrollment numbers but with the ratio of undergraduate to graduate students.

"Summer school is not just for graduate students sometimes has even surpassed it.

anymore," Schminke says. He added that over the last few years the number of undergraduate students enrolled at the University has been on level with the graduates and in the summer that they think they may have problems getting during the regular academic year," Schminke says, which may be adding to their increased numbers.
