

make a pizza tasty, you will get people to come back.

"Once we get people's attention, I think we can keep it," he says.

Tino's Spaghetti House, 1491 Willamette St., also believes that pleasing the customer is the best defense against other restaurants that offer similar services, says Steve Adkins, a dinner cook at Tino's.

But he says the establishment he works for is different from the others because it will recommend other delivery places if Tino's is too busy or unable to make a delivery for some reason.

Old Town Pizza, at 174 E. Broadway, will formally enter it's hat into the delivery ring in February, says Greg Theisen, one of the restaurant's employees.

Still, he says he doesn't think this will change the way Old Town does business or will turn it into a heavy competitor for delivery dollars.

"We've always been able to attract people with the quality of our food and our atmosphere," he says.

Although competition has become commonplace in the past few years, Peter Goodale, the owner of Pizza Pete's Italian Kitchen, says he uses to have the field to himself.

Goodale says that five years ago his restaurant, at 2673 Willamette St., was the only one in the area that delivered pizza and other Italian food, leaving him most of the business on campus.

Things changed quickly, however, with the economic recession of the late 1970s and the opening of the first Domino's Pizza in the area, he says. "When Domino's came in to town other places saw a market for it (home delivery) again," Goodale says.

"Right now I'm trying to compete with all the other places that deliver," he says. "I don't get much dorm business now, but I'm trying to change that."

And so the race continues.

Most restaurants agree that without a good tasting pizza they wouldn't be in competition to begin with.

Food distribution held

Low-income students can add some food to their cupboards today through a free cheese and butter distribution. The U.S. Department of Agriculture's distribution will be held today at the EMU and other areas in the county. The free cheese and butter are USDA surplus commodities.

The University-area distribution, sponsored by Food Organization of Distributors for Lane County, will be held in Room 101, EMU from 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. The distribution is available to the general public as well as students.

Those wishing to receive cheese and butter must bring a verification of their address such as a postmarked envelope with their name and address on it. No proof of income is required, however.

To be eligible for the food, students must meet monthly gross income guidelines provided by the USDA. The guidelines are as follows:

- One-person households — $569
- Two-person households — $764
- Three-person households — $959
- Four-person households — $1,157
- Five-person households — $1,349
- Six-person households — $1,544
- Seven-person households — $1,739
- Eight-person households — $1,934
