Forecasters warn of floods, heavy snow

By The Associated Press
 A cold front barged into the state Sunday, prompting travelers' advisories for much of northern Oregon and flood warnings for parts of the Willamette Valley.

The National Weather Service warned of locally heavy snows through this morning in the northern Cascades, one of the areas placed under a travelers' advisory.

Forecasters also issued travelers' advisories for the northern Coast Range, the Columbia River Gorge and the metropolitan Portland, where snow was expected above 500 feet.

Arctic air from the Gulf of Alaska will lower freezing levels in the state's northwest corner to near or below 1,000 feet, causing mixed rain and snow at low elevations and snow accumulations above 500 feet, forecasters said.

The weather service posted flood warnings for the Upper Tualatin River at Dilley and the Marys River near Philomath.

A flood warning remained in effect for Johnson Creek in southeast Portland.

The Upper Tualatin at Dilley

and the Marys near Philomath were expected to exceed flood stage this morning.

Forecasters said the Pudding River at Aurora, the Lukiamute River near Suyer and the South Yamhill River near Whiteson should approach flood stage today.

Warning signs were posted at several locations along Foster Road in the Johnson Creek area, where muddy water spilled off steep hillsides and across the road.

Small slides were reported on secondary roads in Lincoln County and standing water hampered travel on U.S. 20 about 17 miles east of Newport, said Ronaye Tylor, a Lincoln County police dispatcher.

Abundant rain washed parts of Western Oregon while lesser amounts fell east of the Cascades.

Rainfall amounts in a 24-hour period ended Sunday afternoon included 3.32 inches at Newport, 2.10 inches at Salem, 1.65 inches at North Bend and 1.62 inches at Pacific City.
