Rare whale found on beach

LINCOLN CITY (AP) — An extremely rare type of whale, which has a dolphin-like head, has been discovered dead on an Oregon beach, a finding that has been called a breakthrough by marine scientists.

Bruce Mate, an Oregon State University researcher, identified the 15-foot adult male animal as a Stejneger's beaked whale, one of 30 thought to exist.

"Never before has there been an intact skeleton collected from an adult male of this species," Mate said. "In fact, fewer than 12 skull specimens of this species have ever been recovered."

Mate said the species is known for a "saber tooth, about the size of an ax, which sticks up from the lower jaw." The animal was found Sunday by a resident near Gleneden Beach.

Mate and other volunteers of the Northwest Marine Mammal Stranding Network planned to strip the flesh from the dead animal and save its carcass.

Mate said the skeleton will be prepared at the Hatfield Marine Science Center in Newport and will eventually be put on display at the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C.

James Mead of the Mammal Division of the Smithsonian said very little is known about the species.

"We presume they inhabit deep water, and they are shy of ships, and we also presume they have the capability to remain submerged for up to an hour," he said. "With those factors, it's not surprising we have very little data on them."

Mead said the Smithsonian currently has skeletons of three juveniles and two adult females of the species.

Thomas R. Loughlin of the National Marine Fisheries Service in Seattle said it is the second time that a Stejneger's beaked whale has been found on the Oregon Coast. The first occurred at Yaquina Bay in 1904.
