

Goldschmidt promises broad changes if elected

Democrat Neil Goldschmidt's campaign for governor has been run on a platform of economic and political change.

"If you like the way things are, if you like the way our economy is headed, then vote for Norma Paulus," Goldschmidt said. "But if you want to see some changes, then I'm your candidate."

"If I'm elected, the old rules are going in the garbage can," he said. "We're going to sell our products to anyone who wants them. We're going to work for people who are here, and work to create jobs for people who want to come here."

Goldschmidt, a University graduate, said higher education is one of his top priorities. "It should be possible to take a great education and put it to work in Oregon," he said. "That's what this election is all about."

Goldschmidt will try to raise $10 million to endow faculty positions at the University,

Oregon State University and Portland State University, he said.

"The first three million will come from private contributions, and then I will ask the state Legislature for three million," he said. "We will encourage the institutions themselves to raise the rest."

"We want to create a different attitude. We want to build a habit of private giving in Oregon," Goldschmidt said.

"Neil has the ability to attract the private sector," said Ted Kulongoski, Gov. Vic Atiyeh's unsuccessful challenger in the 1982 gubernatorial race. "He will build partnerships between the public sector, private sector and government."

"Neil sees the governor as someone who should be very aggressive in collecting endowments and grants from private business," said David Bragdon, issues manager for the Goldschmidt campaign. "He will also go after additional federal grants from the National Science Foundation."

Oregon's economy will be Goldschmidt's main focus as governor, he said. "Last year 429,000 people waited in lines for free food. That's 15 percent of our population," he said. "In no period since the depression has our economy been this bad off, according to this administration's statistics."

Goldschmidt's first action would be to get every county to take stock of its assets and develop an economic plan within one year, he said.

He believes there are appropriate times for government to intervene in business, he said. As former President Carter's transportation secretary, Goldschmidt was one of the architects of the Chrysler bail-out.

Neil Goldschmidt

"I believe the governor should take action when there is a real reason for management to do their job better, and for workers to be more productive," Goldschmidt said.

"With Neil, there will be more community development rather than industrial promotions like trips to Japan," Bragdon said.

Goldschmidt believes his past work experience gives him an advantage over opponent Norma Paulus, he said.

"I think it's a choice of someone who has done difficult things and someone who has not," he said.

Paulus said, however, that Goldschmidt's only experience in government has been "spending its money."

Goldschmidt was mayor of Portland from 1972 to 1979, U.S. Secretary of Transportation from 1979 to 1981 and most recently vice president of Nike Inc. in Portland.

Since he announced his candidacy in June of 1985, polls show that Goldschmidt has been gaining slowly on Paulus. He also has gained endorsements from major labor organizations and the National Organization for Women.

Despite recent polls which show Goldschmidt with a slim lead, Paulus said Goldschmidt's momentum peaked two weeks ago.

"I'm going to win," she said. "I can just feel it."

Kulongoski also believes Goldschmidt has won already.

"All the undecideds are falling his way. The last nail in the coffin is going to be a large voter turnout, which will be the biggest in 20 years," he said.

Goldschmidt is not as optimistic.

"I feel better than I did 60 days ago, but I still don't have any confidence in the outcome," he said. "This is not one where your vote won't make a difference — it will make a difference."

Goldschmidt believes the race is so close, it may take days before a winner is announced, he said.

If he loses, Goldschmidt said he probably will return to work at Nike.

And if he wins, Goldschmidt said he will be one busy governor.
