

Newly elected leaders to attend statewide seminars in Eugene

About 1,500 city and state officials, representing about 120 Oregon cities, will meet in Eugene this weekend for the 61st annual League of Oregon Cities conference.

Participants, including mayors, city councilors, city managers and finance officers, will attend sessions on topics such as tourism, risk management, economic development and using libraries as a community resource, said Sylvia Rose, conference coordinator.

A session on the Hanford Nuclear Reservation, one of three sites being studied as a potential nuclear waste storage site, also will be offered.

Other sessions include:

- "Reagan Federalism: Impact and Implications."
- "Working with the Legislature."
- and "Getting Money in the Till."

Newly elected Gov. Neil Goldschmidt is scheduled to speak to participants, who will stay at the Eugene Hilton, the Ramada Inn and other area hotels during the four-day conference.

Rose said the conference could have an important impact on the state because many of the participants are newly elected officials who will be taking home new ideas from the seminars.

The conference will also be a chance for city leaders to meet and set collective goals for the legislative year, Rose said.

Participants will tour several Eugene facilities during their stay, including area parks and the Permit and Information Center.

The League of Oregon Cities, established in 1925, is an organization to assist cities in increasing their efficiency and in serving their citizens. Currently, 238 of Oregon's 242 cities are members of the league.

all at once, it will allow the University to coordinate planning within the various departments," he said.

The new construction will also free up space for other activities in the existing science buildings, Moseley said.

New Architecture and Allied Art studios are under construction and should be completed by December, when construction will start on a replacement building for the Museum of Natural History, Rowe said. By spring term, work will be underway on Science IV-B, Science V and Science VI.

"It will be an inconvenience, no way around it. But when the two-year period of construction is over, people will think it was actually worth the trouble," Rowe said.

Models of proposed artwork for the science buildings are currently on display in the newly remodeled EMU art gallery near the EMU Ballroom. An architectural model showing the whole science project is included in the exhibition.

Prior to today's ceremony, the science departments will host visitors in the science laboratories from noon until 2:15 p.m. Members of the Student University Relations Council will conduct informal tours that will start at a tent located near 13th Avenue and University Street.

Featured displays include lasers, molecular models, computer graphics, sophisticated microscopes and other areas of University research.

A free public reception in the EMU will follow the ceremony.
