is given an extra letter when hired that says, "you're hired pending a check of your grades at the end of this term," Romm says.

Until about four years ago, the housing department did not hire sophomores as RAs, Romm says. Changing the rule resulted in a larger pool of applicants, he says.

"There was a feeling from the people who were RAs at the time that we were losing a real enthusiastic bunch of people by not hiring sophomores," Romm says.

Freshmen are almost never hired as RAs unless they are older because they often are still trying to adjust to college life, he says.

"We don't feel freshman have enough maturity within the setting of a university," he says.

Most RAs are in their third year of school either as sophomores or juniors, Romm says. Few graduate students are RAs because they usually can find higher-paying jobs that are more related to their academic goals, he says.

An RA's duties include working with residence hall officers, planning programs during advisory board and student government meetings and enforcing quiet hours and rules of conduct, Romm says. They also fill out occupancy rosters and weekly reports, and open doors for residents locked out of their rooms.

Johnson says being both a disciplinarian and a friend is one of the hardest things about his job. "It takes someone who can stand in that gray area," he says. "A lot of people don't realize they (RAs) have been on the other end of the stick."

He adds, "Some people think that RAs are superhuman. They forget that they have feelings and problems, too."

It is frustrating to deal with troublemakers who come in from other halls, Leith says. Because she is not their RA, they think they have no reason to listen to her, she says.

"Sometimes it's hard because I don't feel like I have to be a policeman and patrol the halls," Leith says.

But she says that by the year's end, she will be much more independent and organized. "I'd like to feel like I made a difference in people's lives," she says. "I'd like to leave here knowing that I did a good job and that I did the best I could."
