Democrat Neil Goldschmidt was inaugurated Monday as the state's 33rd governor in a ceremony marked with all the pomp and circumstance of a royal coronation.

Goldschmidt delivered his inaugural address to a packed House full of legislators and their families. Spectators stood in the entryways and overflowed four hearing rooms set up with video monitors, interrupting the speech several times with adulating applause.

Goldschmidt acknowledged "the legacies of caring and commitment left us by our predecessors," but said the state faces "hard choices" to ensure the future. He also cited outgoing Gov. Victor Atiyeh for "his integrity, his decency, and his concern for our state."

Goldschmidt vowed to "tell our educators that they will have the resources they need to teach; that the learning they have to offer our children is, more than ever, the ladder to opportunity.

"We will tell our children that their learning is assured and that work is available — here, at home, in Oregon," Goldschmidt said. "We will not surrender their jobs to foreign workers."

Goldschmidt also called on citizens to work together to implement his "Oregon Comeback." "As partners in the work that lies ahead, we have the capacity to help each other by summoning from each the best that each has to offer," he said.

The new governor offered few specifics concerning his economic development pro-

Higher ed proposals highlighted

SALEM, Ore. — Gov. Neil Goldschmidt will release a full copy of the state budget he is recommending to the legislature sometime today.

But a budget summary released after his Monday inauguration gave a few clues to how the stage may be set in the higher education arena as Oregon's 64th Legislative Assembly gets underway.

Goldschmidt is recommending $25.4 million be added to the State System of Higher Education's base operating budget, including $10 million for "selected" faculty salary increases.

That figure contrasts with the State System's requested $47 million for faculty salary increases this biennium.

The budget summary said 3 percent tuition increases at state colleges and universities will be relied upon to keep the higher education budget in pace with inflation.

The Governor is recommending $1 million be given to the State Scholarship Commission for grants to students solely on the basis of scholastic achievement and aptitude. This would be the first merit-based financial aid program ever initiated by the Scholarship Commission, and is intended to end the so called Oregon "brain drain" trend of top scholars attending out-of-state colleges and universities.

The State Board of Higher Education supports the merit-based scholarships but student lobbyist groups are expected to oppose the program because it is not based on financial need.

The budget recommendation includes an extra $2.9 million to be reserved to meet the demands on state universities when enrollment exceeds projections.

Goldschmidt also is recommending $5 million be used for endowed faculty chair positions, scholarships, and other matched university activities. This seed money is intended to start research in Oregon, which can attract more money from private industry and federal sources, and help stimulate the state's economy.

Goldschmidt is recommending $14 million in lottery money be allocated to colleges for economic development projects, and that $11.2 million in lottery proceeds be used for the uncompleted Centers of Excellence.

Goldschmidt releases 1987 budget proposal

SALEM, Ore. (AP) — Gov. Neil Goldschmidt on Monday proposed a $3.6 billion state general fund budget that calls for no new taxes but recommends spending increases in most areas of government.

The following is a rundown of his recommendations:

- A $36.6 billion total budget, a 7.3 percent increase.
- New income tax amnesty program and a stepped-up effort against delinquent taxpayers.
- A call on the Legislature to tie new federal income tax changes to state tax laws, but to cut state tax rates so the state doesn't end up with more money.
- $25 million for economic development projects by region.
- An increase of 5 percent to $993 million, which would keep state aid at its current 29 percent level of local schools' total costs.
- A 3 percent a year tuition increase at state colleges and universities.
- $25 million for higher education, including $10 million for selected faculty raises, $5 million for endowed chairs, scholarships and similar activities and nearly $5 million for college public services programs.

- A new $1 million state scholarship fund for merit-based grants.
- $1.2 million to control plant disease and expand international marketing of Oregon agricultural products, and $1 million to step up monitoring and regulation of water resources.
- A 15 percent spending increase for the Motor Vehicles Division to reduce public waiting lines.
- 2 percent pay raises each year for state employees as part of $43 million allotted for state salary and benefit improvements.
- $10 million for "comparable worth" pay increases for employees found to be earning less than other workers doing jobs of comparable value.
- Funds to add three judges to the 10-member Oregon Court of Appeals.
- $54 million for a corrections-crime program Goldschmidt outlined last week, including $32 million to provide 1,600 new prison beds around the state.
- An increase for the governor's office, from $3.3 to $5.3 million.
