provement is a "tax-increment financing plan," which he says is already used by many of the nation's cities to create revenues for new roads, sewage systems, parking lots and other developments that can be used to attract new industries.

The plan will virtually pay for itself by generating revenues as the value of developed real estate increases and accordingly the property tax base, Gorman says. But this will only affect commercial areas, not residential property owners, he adds.

Gorman points to the existence of a multi-million dollar site known as Booth-Kelly, which was donated to the city of Springfield by Georgia-Pacific many years ago. He feels the site can be renovated and used for commercial development in the future.

Goldschmidt has taken a tour of that site and may seek lottery
