

non-minority law students considered to be at an educational disadvantage to enter the legal profession, law professor Fredric Merrill said.

The Student Bar Association (SBA) sponsored an information and discussion meeting between Merrill, a member of the ASP faculty review committee, Law School Dean Maurice Holland, ASP Director Charles Finke and interested students yesterday at the Law School. Professor Charles Wilkinson served as the moderator.

Finke estimated yearly operational costs for the program, which is over two years old, to be about $50,000. The Law School currently pays $20,000, and Merrill said the problem is finding that other $30,000.

The initial $30,000 for operation during the first year was received through a grant, Merrill said. The second year, that money came from the University.

Holland said that if the program was continued and outside funding was not found, the money would be coming out of the Law School's pocket.

"That $30,000 primarily is the salary of a full-time program director. We certainly can't pay the program's tutors any less," he said. "What it may come down to is having a full-time director and giving up at least one faculty appointment for next year."

Holland and Merrill said they both understood how important the program was to a lot of students, but the money isn't readily available.
