

New human resources director named

By Scott Maben
Of the Emerald

Linda King was named director of the human resources department Thursday, replacing Jack Steward who retired Jan. 31. She was the department benefits administrator since 1981.

Managing a staff of 17, King controls faculty and staff benefits.

As the appointing authority for the University, King is responsible for the hiring, training and compensation of about 1,400 full-time and part-time classified and management service employees as well as 2,000 student workers.

The department recently was renamed human services from its old title of personnel services. In addition to handling benefits, the department will render its usual services for employment, classification, training and labor relations.

The name change reflects an attempt to reverse a common perception that the department is just for record-keeping, King said.

"The existing level of services will be enhanced to provide a function that supports the work force with more depth," primarily by implementing innovative programs, she said.

One major project King said she hopes to set in full swing is to establish a network of communication for employees interested in legislative decisions concerning the comparable worth bill. Depending on what transpires in Salem, King plans to provide employees with information on the issue and the opportunity to give input on job values.

Other than that, her major goal is to make sure human resources becomes known as a service-oriented department.

"I want to make sure employees are getting what they need from the department," King said. "It's certainly a challenge."
