Who should keep the child in the 'Baby M' surrogate mother case?

'I definitely think the mother who gave birth to the child should keep it. Sometimes a person may think it is easy to give up a baby, but when they see it, they just can't.'

— Kaye Rauch, sophomore, physical therapy

'The whole situation is bad. It seems like a breach of contract on the part of the surrogate mother. She is at fault because she put the family through grief. After all, it is the father's child also.'

— Eric Aegerter, freshman, undeclared

'I pretty much think that if she signed a contract to give the baby up to the mother, she should follow it.'

— Liz Wolfe, senior, elementary education

'I think the father should have just as much a right as the mother to keep the baby. In cases like that, they should decide which parent is the most capable to raise the child. The people on the father's side seem more capable, both financially and emotionally.'

— Joan Wood, junior, finance

'It is not a legal issue, it is more of an ethical question. One thing I don't like is the way the mother is being portrayed; she is being portrayed as being incapable just because she is not from a very privileged background.'

— Michael Mulcrone, graduate student, journalism

'I think that the surrogate mother should have realized the limitations of the whole case when she signed the agreement, and the parents who contracted her should keep the baby because she knew what she was getting into when she signed the contract.'

— Becky Kaufmann, senior, psychology
