

military war games. The purpose of war games is to evaluate strategies for using weapons to control resources, and the purpose of the World Game is to evaluate needs and create non-coercive strategies for the use of resources to meet human needs, according to World Game literature.

World Game Projects, based in Philadelphia, Pa., has been developing products and presenting workshops since 1969 to more than 60 universities and various world organizations including the U.S. Congress, Gabel said.

"What the World Game is is not just what we do here tonight, it is a research and educational organization. The educational part is what we will be dealing with here," Gabel said.

"People here are not just passive observers, they are participants and problem solvers," he said.

Jennifer Young, a sophomore majoring in Japanese, said she decided to participate in the game to become more aware of the problems facing the world today, and then communicate what she has learned to others.

"I'm interested in things that happen with world hunger and the nuclear issue. I want to be able to learn more about the possibilities and then talk to people about what is happening," she said.

Approximately 30 people attended the workshop, which was a fund-raiser for the Survival Center.
