

outside shot." Although all five Oregon starters finished in double figures Wednesday against Eastern Washington, Heiny was displeased with the lack of a running game—they finished with only 12 fast-break points, most of which occurred after the game was academic. He blamed that partly on point guard Carol Drouet's knee, which may have been re-injured in the final regular season game against the University of California at Berkeley last week. "She was a little sluggish at first, but she came on strong towards the end," Heiny said. The other part was geared towards the strong defense of the Eagles, a team which kept the game close until a late Oregon run. "I think maybe we were playing a team that was better than everyone thought," Heiny said. But that game is history, and now the emphasis is on a win Saturday, which is the last home appearance for seniors Lauri Landerholm, Gabi Neumann and Kim Neal. "I don't even think our team knows the next game is in Los Angeles because we know we've got the 10th-ranked team in the nation up next," Heiny said. "I think it's been a very good season for all of us, and the team isn't done yet. Right now we're winning for pride and to show we can do it."
