Should classified research be allowed at the proposed Riverfront Research Park?

'I would say it should depend on what kind of research they were doing. There could be some things that could be justifiably researched in secrecy for security reasons.'

— Peter Reiner, community education student, speech and communication

'Yes, if you want businesses there, and to be successful they should be able to do classified research. It should be up to the public, but it shouldn't be under total public scrutiny. Businesses should not be discouraged from locating here.'

— Phil Hreha, junior, computer science

'No, I don't think we should have classified research. I think the University should be open about what it is doing here, and I think there is an open possibility for weapons research that is not so direct, so I think we should ban classified research.'

— Charlotte Richardson, freshman, comparative literature

'I would have to say generally I do not agree with classified weapons research due to the nature of the subject, but I have a problem with classifying all research. It would give a bad image to businesses who want to come here and work at the park.'

— Tom Jacobs, senior, biology

'Absolutely not. I think it is a complete mistake to mix education with military defense. It is a bad policy, especially if they cannot tell us what is going on.'

— Nina Johnson, sophomore, anthropology
