granting institutions, he said. "It's a matter of hard economics for the depressed region of southern Oregon," Tyran said.

But the State Board is not sure that a name change would make as much difference as Tyran and Shelby claim, said Wil Post, State Board vice chancellor for public affairs.

The college's ability to help attract business and money does not depend on the name of the school, but instead it's a function of how well the school relates to and serves the community, Post said.

"Southern Oregon State College has done very, very well serving the southwestern Oregon economic unit," Post said.

The bill does not give additional funding to SOSC. But with the State Board's current definition, faculty members at Oregon universities earn about $3,000 to $4,000 more on average than Oregon college faculty.
