Minority Caucus makes no endorsements

By Alicia Gano
 Of the Emerald

The Minority Caucus on Tuesday decided not to endorse any candidates running for election because it was unable to reach a consensus about whom to endorse.

The group, when formed, had agreed not to endorse without a consensus.

Caucus member Mike Kennedy said the purpose of the group, as a communication task force, was to "put pressure on the administration to discuss minority problems and find solutions."

Specifically, caucus members want the University to address minority hiring of staff members and recruitment of minority students locally, nationally and internationally.

Tommie Reynolds, an exchange student from Alabama University, an all-black campus, said he was shocked at the lack of minority students on this campus. He described a sense of alienation and stereotyping minority students feel upon entering such a non-diverse environment.

"Diversity on campus is lacking. Eugene has the potential for offering culture that isn't being tapped," Reynolds said.

Melissa Dahl, another caucus member agreed, but is concerned with another aspect of the student recruitment problem. She worries that minority high school students are less likely to consider college as an alternative because of their social standing. Without encouragement from the University, she believes this situation will not change, she said.

receive U.S. security clearances. These security clearances are necessary for classified U.S. government research, she said.

This bill deals specifically with that category of research, she said, and would eliminate this from happening.

The University and Oregon State University already have formal bans on classified research and would not visibly be affected by the bill, Moseley said.

The proposed Riverfront Research Park, which likely would be occupied by private firms leasing property from the University, would only be affected by the legislation if University facilities were to be located at the park, according to Moseley. As it is now planned, the park would not be part of the University, he said.
