FEMA Continued from Page 1A

March 3, the federal agency gave the state until June 30 to conduct what it termed "communication exercises."

But William Mayer, FEMA's region 10 director, said in a letter received Monday, "We propose an alternative which would both alleviate Oregon's concern with nuclear detonations and produce the kind of information and learning experience" required of such a drill.

The letter said the alternate scenario will not involve simulated nuclear detonations but will simulate a "period of increasing international tensions leading up to a time when nuclear exchange is possible, if not probable."

Most of the credit for FEMA's change of heart should go to Oregon's congressional delegation in Washington, Goldschmidt said.

The governor said both Republicans and Democrats in the nation's capitol pushed hard in support of Oregon's decision not to participate in the exercises.

Court Continued from Page 1A

If the petitioners are dissatisfied by the decisions of these state agencies, they should raise the issue in the Oregon courts, he wrote.

Maureen Kirk, OSPIRG state board of directors chairwoman, said she was pleased by the decision.

"It would have been a bad idea for the court to hear the case," she said, adding it is a real victory for student rights because the wishes of the student body and the IFC have not been questioned. Both these bodies have approved OSPIRG funding in the past.

Cathy Duvall, OSPIRG campus coordinator, has mixed feelings about the decision. She hopes people do not look at the decision as the court limiting its own power, she said.

"One way to look it (the decision) is that students do not have the right to look at First Amendment issues," she said. She sees this as a "pro-students' rights" action because the Constitution Court realized it only has the power students have given it in the past, she said.

Randall cannot believe the court stopped the suit at this point, he said. He believes the court should have accepted jurisdiction and then decided not to hear the case if it didn't want to deal with the issues raised, he said.

"We're not giving up until we get a fair trial," he said. "And we won't have that with an SPA-dominated Court."

Randall's next move will be an appeal to University President Paul Olum, and after that, the State Board of Higher Education, he said.

phone calls lobbying for legislative support to the Senate Education Committee, Hill said.

Likewise, Sen. Mike Thorne, D-Pendleton, co-chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, said the Athletic Department has submitted no requests for support to the Ways and Means Committee.

"Basically it is an economic argument. There are just too many competing economic needs in higher education," Hill said. A freeze on tuition costs or additional funding for the University Main Library have higher priority in the Legislature, he said.

Earlier this year, the State Board of Higher Education resolved to keep the Ducks and Beavers in the Pac-10.

But the State Board has not yet acted on that resolution.

"The State Board is very serious about keeping them in the Pac-10," said Bill Lemman, State Board vice chancellor.

General Fund money for athletics is not a possibility, he said. Instead, the State Board may consider options that will reduce athletic program expenses, such as tuition waivers for athletes. But until the State Board has received its budget from the Legislature, it won't be able to consider options for athletic funding.

"We should not kid ourselves and think the state is going to solve the problem of athletics," said Rep. David Dix, D-Eugene. "The state is not interested in providing general funds, but students shouldn't be asked to carry the load for the athletes."

The answer for the University and OSU athletic departments' funding problems can only be arrived at through a "discussion with the people of this state," Dix said.
