

emerge until the beginning of fall drills in August.

That means the Ducks will look more to the running game this fall, which means last year's promising tandem, Derek Loville and Latin Berry, will carry the ball more along with newcomer Russell Lawson.

"The offense is not going to be centralized on the quarterback position as it was a year ago. Hopefully we'll come back to the way it was Chris' sophomore and junior year, when we had a more solid running game," Brooks said. Loville had 544 yards and 10 touchdowns to his credit last season, while Berry, who has gone only part-time this spring since he also participates in track, added 291 yards and four scores. "Yesterday Berry had his first and only contact of the spring. Loville's been hurt, but he went out yesterday and showed us signs of a year ago," Brooks said.

The biggest gap is at the offensive line, and that thorn alone appears to have hindered Oregon's progress on offense more than any other aspect. Brooks has the right tackle, center and left guard positions solidified with Chris Husko, Gary Gilbert and Jeff Stefanick. He is currently looking at five different players to plug the holes at left tackle and right guard.

"We've created some problems there by shuffling people around," he said.
