

the county, and the rest from fees.

Woodward said one of the main problems is, "The cities don't trust the county commissioners." The city thinks the proposed district will be used for something other than the Extension Service, he said.

However, forming a special district creates legal problems, said David Whitlow of Eugene's city council office. "By law if a special district is created, other services could be added," Whitlow said.

"I'm having a difficult time deciding whether there's another problem the city has not stated," Rogers said. "I can't believe there's any worry with the city."

Rogers accepts the fact of proliferation of service districts, but said the Board of Commissioners would be the governing body of the special district. He said the commissioners would have no reason to add another service to the proposed district.

Two alternatives are possible, according to Whitlow. One is restricting the ballot title and making sure the ballot language is worded properly. Another alternative is an intergovernmental agreement that would forbid other services from being added.

The Lane County Local Government Boundary Commission also must approve the proposed district. The boundary commission is a state committee approved by the governor with veto authority. Woodward said this committee may think the district is a duplication of services.
