

passing yardage and total offense.

His true worth was probably not recognized until the middle of his sophomore season in a game against the then top-ranked team in the country, the University of Washington. With the Ducks ahead 10-7 and in control, Miller was forced to leave the game with a concussion. The Oregon offense was not the same after that, and the Huskies averted a major upset with a 17-10 victory.

Miller scrambled and threw the Ducks to an exciting 6-5 season in 1985. And last season, a dubious one in the absence of offensive standouts Tony Cherry and Lew Barnes, Oregon reeled after six straight losses and finished 5-6. But those five wins can be directly attributed to Miller's athletic ability and versatility.

It is those traits in particular that garnered this award and prompted postgame statements like this one, from tight end Bobby DeBisschop. "Chris Miller," he said after this year's Stanford game, "is without a doubt the best athlete I've ever seen."

That is a heady statement, but it is by no means unfounded. Miller even briefly flirted with a professional baseball career, playing last summer with teams at Bellingham, Wash., and Salinas, Calif., in the Seattle Mariners' farm system.

And when it came time to show his stuff in front of pro scouts, Miller played to perfection in postseason all-star games, projecting himself from a preconceived third to fourth round selection to the NFL's elite club of 28 in the first round.

"He certainly gave Oregon fans exciting football to watch," said Oregon coach Rich Brooks when Miller was drafted, "and he prepared himself very well for the NFL."

Now we just sit back and watch ...

THE GAME OF QUICK DRAW

Pictionary is the rousing new board game that is played like charades, only on paper. Instead of acting, you and your teammates try to guess the identities of various words by sketching clues to each other. You don't have to be an artist to play, all that's needed is imagination and a fast pencil.
