Anti-nuke protesters plan future

By Carolyn Lamberson
Of the Emerald

The number people who protest nuclear arms testing needs to grow by "10 or 100 fold" in order to slow down the nuclear arms race, said Eugene peace activist Nancy Hale Tuesday night.

Hale, an organizer for the American Peace Test, gave a brief speech on civil disobedience and the nuclear arms race and answered questions after a video presentation at the University law school.

tested the presence of the House Un-American Activities Committee in San Francisco in May 1960. This was the start of the student movement that heightened during the mid- and late-1960s.

The film combined recent footage from the reunion and footage from the actual demonstration. Following the film presentation, Hale gave a brief speech before opening the floor for discussion.

set aside for "parking and demonstrations," Hale said.

But now, the Nye County, Nev., district attorney has agreed not to prosecute the demonstrators when they cross onto the test site, she said. Demonstrators are handcuffed, put on a bus, driven two or three miles away from the site, and given citations. Then the charges against them are dropped, Hale said.

Hale, spent nine months in Las Vegas, Nev., organizing non-violent direct actions at the government's nuclear testing site in the Nevada desert.

"Our hearts have more to do with the revolution than we may imagine," Hale said, and added the film may have been "an almost myopic view of what's going on in Nevada" because at the time of filming, APT was 5 months old and has since grown in size.

"I think the idea was to take the wind out of our sails and we would just go away," Hale said.

"At this point, APT is holding off on its next action until March," she said, when the group hopes to have a large-scale, non-violent direct action.

The video presentation included a recording of the APT direct action in summer 1986 and interviews with those who took part in the demonstration. Also shown was a locally produced film called "The Torch Is Passed," dealing with the 20th anniversary reunion of a student group from University of California at Berkeley.

Several of those taking part in the round table discussion have already visited the test site, but Hale said numbers would need to grow dramatically before the impact on the nuclear arms race would be felt.

The possibility for violent confrontation with the police at the test site is always there, Hale said. Usually, however, the police treat the protesters well and if anything, get a few chuckles and a lot of money out the deal, she added.

The group, SLATE, formed in the late 1950s and made national headlines when it pro-

Hale also touched upon the legal maneuvering necessary to conduct an action of civil disobedience. Originally, the protesters were allowed onto the test site in a designated area

"I think they realize that violence toward us would galvanize us," she said.

The discussion was co-sponsored by the Women's Law Forum and Clergy and Laity Concerned.
