Completed in 1955, Dexter Lake offers outdoor enthusiasts a good sailing locale and year round moorage.

Ridge and Dexter.

"We've created lakes where there didn't use to be lakes, so all the normal wildlife, including birds, mammals, reptiles and amphibians that live around lakes, are now around these lakes," Lamster said.

"Fern Ridge is the most well known because it has a lot of shallow, marshy areas so you get all the typical wading birds and lots of song birds that live in the marshes," he said, adding that Dexter is the home to a few elk and deer as well.

According to Chapman, the water surfaces at Fern Ridge and Dexter are managed by the Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife under a contract with the Corps of Engineers. At Fern Ridge, the department's work has centered on the south side of the reservoir, away from the north side where most of the parks are located.

"There is much higher values on the south area and the Amazon Slough and some of the wetland areas in the south than there are in the north side," Chapman said. However, Richardson Park does have some marsh and wildlife areas, he said.

Besides Richardson Park, Lane County also operates Orchard Point and Zumwalt parks at Fern Ridge. Orchard Point has picnic sites, concession stands, playground equipment, a marina, a boat ramp, and two swim bays. Richardson Park is less developed but still includes a picnic area, a marina, a boat ramp and a swim beach.

"Both are of those parks are very heavily used," Chapman said.

Zumwalt, on the other hand, has been the victim of vandalism and reduced maintenance over the past several years. When the recession of the early '80s descended upon Lane County, the parks department was hit severely with Zumwalt one of the main casualties.

"Parks (department) was completely closed down, and Zumwalt was one of the parks closed. We've never reopened it. It received very heavy vandalism when it was closed. It will take quite a bit of money to
