was sent out to look for him, and they found his body full of arrows halfway up the slope.

Another version explains that the butte was named by Dr. Elijah White in 1845 while he was exploring the area for the purpose of locating an emigrant road to the eastern states. The doctor was so impressed with the view from the summit that he named the butte in honor of then-Secretary of War John C. Spencer.

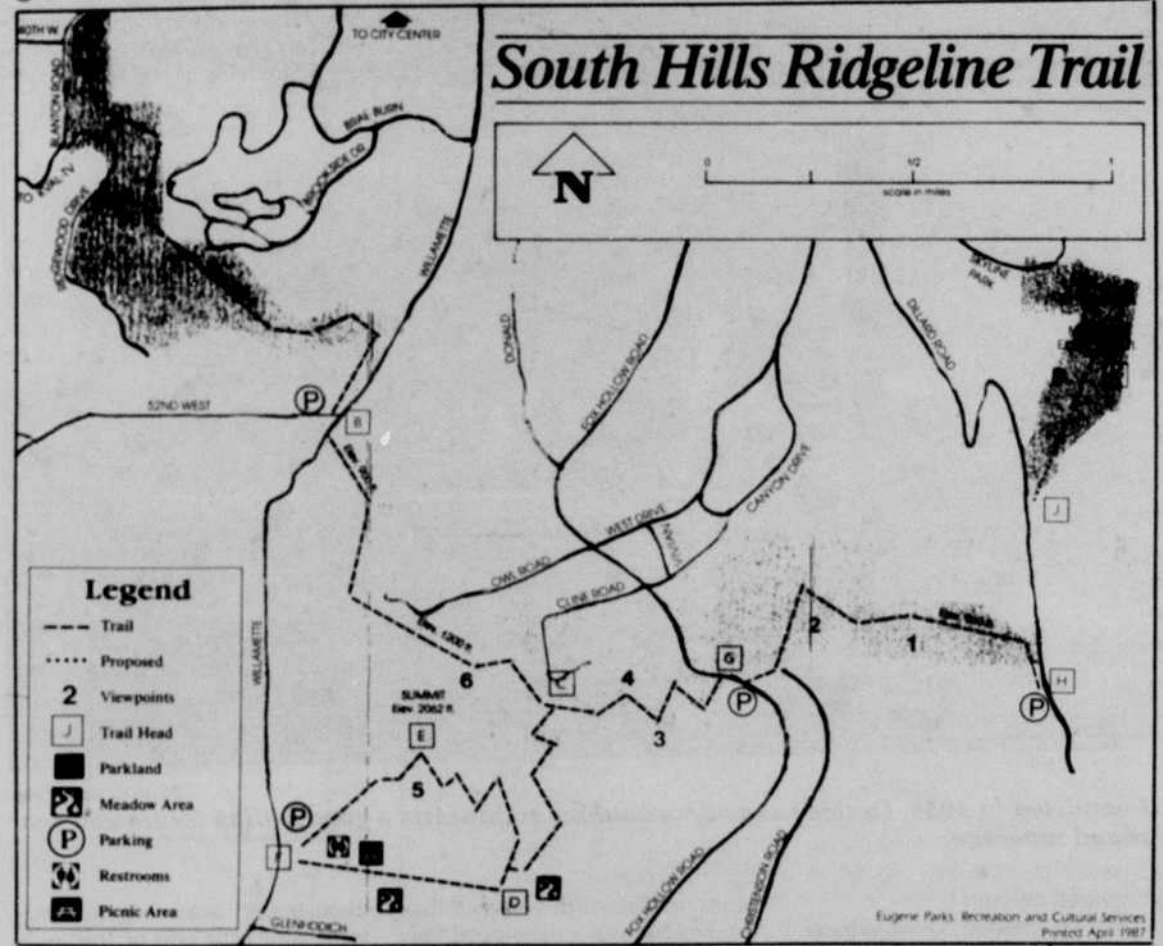

Located at the base of Spencer Butte is the South Hills Ridgeline Trail. The three and one-half mile trail offers spectacular views of the Cascades, the Coburg Hills and Mt. Baldy, and a profusion of flora and fauna.

Douglas firs are the most common trees along the trail while the Spencer Butte region of the trail is said to have the largest variety of ferns than any other single spot in Oregon. Trilliums, fawn lilies and fairy slipper orchids are some of the wildflowers found in the area. But poison oak is prevalent in the area, so use caution when venturing off the trail.
