Rise in fall term enrollment forces changes in classes

By Ingrid White

As fall arrives in all of its splendor the University will be preparing to accommodate the largest number of students in its history.

The University has become such a desirable place to study that deadlines for admission applications had to be imposed so the number of enrolling students for fall would not surpass 18,000.

In the spring, the University received a flood of admission applications from prospective students. The deadlines for admission applications were set to control the enrollment. According to James Buch, University Director of Admissions, "The deadlines were set mainly to reduce the size of the freshman class."

"The largest increases in enrollment will appear within the senior and graduate levels, which are designed to take in a larger number of students than the freshman level," Buch said.

The University reaches its optimum level of student capacity at 17,500. Although the projected fall enrollment is reaching 17,800, the system will not collapse, Buch added.

"Due to the spread of newly admitted students, the system can maintain and not crash. In the senior and graduate levels we have programs designed to accommodate larger numbers of students. Whereas, in the freshman level it is much more difficult to deal with," Buch said.

The University's popularity has not increased suddenly; rather, enrollment has been steadily on the rise for the past five years. According to Buch, the University has always been a good school. "Recently it has become attractive to a wider range of students," he added.

Buch credits the enrollment increase to students being better prepared and to an increase in the retention of continuing students.

The increasing enrollment at the University has had a beneficial impact. In 1982 and 1983 enrollment was predicted to decrease. With the opposite occurring, the budget was increased, enabling the faculty to grow and change in a manner that would not have been possible without the increase, Buch said.

With the rise in the number of classes per day, the usage of classrooms and the number of instructors also will have to increase, Buch said.

Funding to make the adjustments is available, and if it is necessary to create more classes at the time of registration there is money in reserve to do so, Buch said.
