would be to come up with some sort of proposition. How could I go wrong?

I called the agency back, hoping I could spark a second interest. "I have a proposition," I said to the same voice who had called moments before. "I'm willing to volunteer my services for 30 days."

My heart was pounding. I wanted this job and I was willing to starve to get it. Even though, at 155 pounds, I could barely afford to do so.

I started the next day. At the end of the month that I had contracted for I was hired.

The point is pure and simple: Risk is a four-letter word that spells success. You have to be willing to go the extra mile and bet yourself in every race (or someone else will). Life outside the ivy gate is complex, competitive and complicated with a system all its own.

I expect it will take a while before I get my master's degree in life, but I am learning every day. What "they" said, as hard as it is to admit, is true. You have to pay your dues in order to win. There are no silver platters, only plastic plates. The silver comes later in life and only to a select few.

There are countless avenues to choose from when trying to impress a potential employer, but there's one common denominator: It takes time, patience and constant effort. Positive thinking is paramount.

I've learned that for a few really good jobs that are available, there are equally as few good people to fill them. The most important thing to keep in mind is that if you're persistent, aim yourself toward success, it's a formula that can't miss.

Trever Cartwright graduated from the University of Oregon in March of 1987. He is now gainfully employed by a public relations/marketing/advertising agency in Sacramento.
