At the University of Idaho, students walk to an amphitheater in a wooded area on campus, where they watch a pile of wood go up in smoke and flames.

At Carroll College in Helena, Mont., a makeshift parade wanders through a downtown street amid the chill of the Big Sky.

For students and alums alike, homecoming season is once again in full swing on college campuses around the country.

Some traditions, apparently, never die out.

Most universities and colleges hold the usual mix of events: bonfires, parades, dances, competition between organizations and, of course, football games. But like the schools themselves, homecoming events in the United States also exhibit diversity.

In the football-rabid community of University Park, Penn., for instance, Penn State University students stand guard the night before the game over the statue of a lion, protecting it
