whether bottomless dancers intend to arouse sexual desire. If bars were considered private places, they could legally show live sex shows and other things that have not been topless taverns, the Eugene Police Department and the Eugene city government have received a handful of complaints. Rick Siel, supervisor in charge of the Eugene Police Department's vice and narcotics squad, said the department generally receives complaints from people who morally disapprove of such places. However, the department has received reports that prostitution and drug activity is connected to some local topless places, he said.

deemed legal in Oregon, he said. "Certainly there's no crime in inviting your friends over to your home to watch some people have sex," Gorham said. The Oregon Supreme Court has ruled that nude dancing is a form of expression and therefore is protected by the First Amendment. Although there apparently haven't been any public demonstrations against local tensively on issues affecting gay and lesbian harassment," she said.

Brooks said that aside from Hintsala's resignation, another possibility for resolving the problem could be mediation between Hintsala and members of GALA and other minority groups. Mediation could result in "raising minority awareness" on campus.

However, she said that nothing can be decided until she meets with Hughes today.

"I want everything to be acceptable to all sides," she said. "In no way do I want to compromise GALA's position on this and minimize their indignation, but at the same time, I'm hoping that something good can come out of this instead of something negative."

Hintsala was originally hired for the minority affairs position last spring term by Steve Nelson's ASUO administration. He was re-hired by the Brooks administration. The job description of coordinator for minority affairs does not specifically mention working with GALA.
