"I've got to be more aggressive. I have to be. For the next four games I want to be a violent runner, and attack the defense instead of them attacking me."

Herschel Walker, right?

No, Derek Loville. The Ducks' 5-foot-10-inch,

196-pound tailback. The guy whose picture is scattered throughout the Oregon football press guide and on the sides of city buses. The flashy runner who's supposed to run around tacklers and not through them.

With those words, Derek Loville has placed high expectations on himself, and he knows it.

"There hasn't been a lot of pressure put on me by the fans, but I want to be part of a winning football team, and I put a lot of pressure on myself to do well and help the team win."

The team hasn't been winning lately, and Oregon's running game is suffering. The Ducks are down to 2.6 yards per run, and injuries have taken their toll on the starters, fullback Latin Berry and Loville.

"I've had a few nagging injuries, but I'd like to put those behind me and pick up where I left off last year," Loville said.

Where did he leave off last year? Over the final three games of 1986, Loville rushed for 299 yards and scored three touchdowns.

Those are the kind of numbers that Oregon fans wanted to see coming into 1987, but Loville has been hampered by injuries all season, and the
