Should convicted child molesters be required during their probation to post warning signs at their residence and vehicles stating their conviction?

'Society must adequately deal with child molesters, and if this is going to make an impact on his life, I think it's worthwhile. . . I don't think that it's an infringement on his rights.'

— Mark Anderson, freshman, biology

'Great! Because he should be recognized as a child molester. It's one of the worst things you could do to somebody. It's too bad he's out in the first place.'

— Kela Murchinson, senior, theater

'He's done wrong, but he should not be made to do this. If he's going to be punished, why is he on parole? I'm sure that it will not help his rehabilitation because people will ostracize him.'

— Dai Duong, junior, business

'I would say that it would help society. Maybe he should not have the signs, but people around him should be cautious about him.'

— Masato Katoh, graduate student, international studies

'I don't think that's right at all. If he knows what he's done and he's making a new life for himself, I don't think he needs that. It's like the Scarlet Letter.'

— Maya Highsmith, sophomore, undeclared

'I think it would be good for society, but at the same time, I am worried about his safety. . . I think he needs help so it doesn't happen in the future.'

— Cathy Godric, senior, secondary education
