need? Do they need the support of the faculty... of the taxpayers... of the Legislature? It seems to me they need the support of the students as well. Now looking at those groups, they (the board members) are doing exactly what they accuse President Olum of (doing)," Fadeley said.

Fadeley called attention to the University's newest controversy surrounding the Olum decision — the selection of a new University president. Fadeley noted that the local chapter of the American Association of University Professors have criticized a new policy set forth in part by the board that "cuts the faculty out, cuts the faculty off, and leaves the students (with) really no one to talk to."

Fadeley believes that the president should be equally qualified to serve both as executive officer and as a member of the faculty, and finds the new policy would make "a person totally beholden to the board and to the chancellor," he said.

Fadeley sees the new policy as a change from faculty independent selection or equal balanced participation to one where the decision is made by one person, or by one person "resulting from secret conversations with another," he said.

Fadeley noted that if the University was an institution where there was dropping enrollment, student riots, or a demoralized faculty, then he could understand the board's desire for change. But "none of those things are true. The University is an unqualified success; Paul Olum is a success," Fadeley continued.

Fadeley also accused the board of wanting "an institution that will do what it says."

"We'll decide what's good for you and you'll pay for it," Fadeley said, mimicking the board.

Fadeley thinks the board should be put up to a public discussion of what it has proposed, he said.

"The people have to save the system by talking about what's going on."
