What do you think about the amount of media attention that has been given to the trapped whales?

'It's totally unnecessary. It's no consequence in my life so I didn't care about it ...'

— Alen Menzies, sophomore, political science

'What I hear is that they're bringing in other countries. It's getting more political. I don't like that it is a legitimate cause and they're using that as a political front.'

— Anh Nguyen, sophomore, advertising

'I think we should do everything we can to rescue the whales and I think it is great that all the countries are coming together in a joint effort to help out.'

— Trevor Storlie, sophomore, leisure studies

'Definitely, you've got to help. People should have worked harder faster to get them out. It's not hurting, it's helping by letting people know. More people get involved.'

— Cheryl Jacob, junior, communications

'This is a natural process; if they die they die. I hope they save the whales but they went overboard. There are political intentions. Soviets together, Americans together. It looks good, but it's too much of a media thing.'

— Tom Spross, senior, business management

Student dance group ready to go with new officers and enthusiasm

With a new set of officers and brand new ideas for the upcoming school year, Dance Oregon, the University's student-run dance group, is raring to go.

"We're looking forward to bringing dance professionals from throughout the Pacific Northwest to perform or teach master classes at the University," said Sarah Hauss, Dance Oregon vice president.

In addition to promoting the dance department, group members also would like to promote the importance of the performing arts, Hauss said.

The group's other officers are Lisa Blevins Oxman, president, and Nancy Anderson, secretary. Oxman and Hauss are senior dance majors. Anderson is a graduate student who specializes in folk dance.

Dance Oregon is a student group formed last year to provide dance activities and experience to University students and those in the dance department, said Sherrie Blankenship, administrative assistant for Dance Oregon. It is an offshoot of the Student Dance Board formed in 1965.

Concert performances sponsored by Dance Oregon include Dance '89, held Jan. 12-22; the American College Dance Festival, held April 3-8; and the Spring Student Dance Concert, held May 19-21.
