What do you think about the punishment given to the Beta Theta Pi fraternity?

"I think that the Greek system is trying to propagate unity and oneness, yet the fraternities are really so segregated and there are all these rivalries. There is an appearance and a reality. This is the reality."

— Jocelyn Leibow, senior, rhetoric communication

"The punishment isn't too severe. As far as violence is concerned, any act to deter it, in my view, isn't too severe at all. Whatever they were fighting about shouldn't bring out violence."

— Guzyl DeGuzman, senior, computer science

"I think the punishment was too severe. Taking away a frat's rush is almost causing the house to fall into financial straits. Financially then they won't be able to make it on campus. It's like cutting off the main blood vessel to the brain."

— Troy Melquist, junior, political science

"They should be punished. It seems that it was a little severe because pledging is their lifeline, but the social aspect, the social probation isn't that severe. If they've had a lot of fights in the past maybe this will stop them and improve the house."

— Jenny Herron, freshman, psychology
