Chancellor announces plans to restrict program additions

Thomas Bartlett, state chancellor of higher education, announced Friday that he plans to restrict additions or expansions of instructional academic programs in the state system.

Speaking before the Oregon State Board of Higher Education, Bartlett said resources are too scarce to fund new programs without considering the impact on existing ones.

Jim Sellers, director of communications for the state system, said the chancellor's decision was not "a moratorium" on new programs but an attempt to strengthen existing ones.

According to Holly Zanzville, associate vice chancellor for academic affairs, the restrictions will apply primarily to new instructional programs that would require state funding. The chancellor's concern is the continued quality of existing programs, Zanzville said.

The emphasis on maintenance of existing programs is designed to "keep us competitive," Sellers said.

Sellers cited factors such as faculty salaries and library funding as aspects of the University that attract good faculty and good students. The University needs to be competitive by "making those existing programs stronger" before starting new ones, Sellers said.

Average full-time faculty salaries at the University rank 90th out of 111 public universities that give doctoral level degrees, said Susan Weeks, director of University institutional research services.

Other programs, such as departmental research projects and interdisciplinary institutes that are funded by grants from private and federal sources, would not be affected.

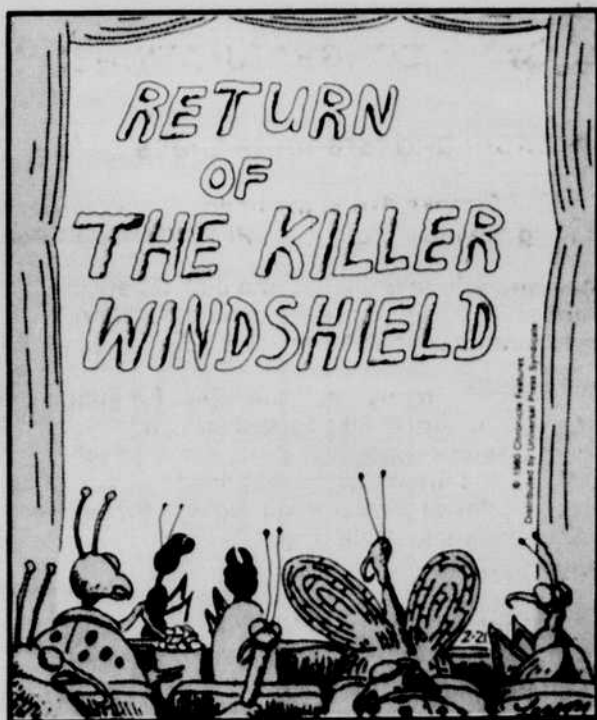

Two such programs would not be affected by Bartlett's decision — an expansion of the coastal law program and a proposal to establish a center for innovative housing research, Zanzville said.

These programs "would be financed primarily by outside funds," Sellers said.

THE ARMY CAN HELP YOU GET A $25,200 EDGE ON COLLEGE.

The Army can help you get an edge on life and earn up to $25,200 for college through the Montgomery GI Bill Plus the Army College Fund.

Here's how it works. You contribute $100 a month for the first year from your $630-plus monthly starting salary. The government then contributes its share, $9,600 from the Montgomery GI Bill plus $14,400 from the Army College Fund for a four-year enlistment.

Army opportunities get better every day. If you qualify, you could train in one of over 250 challenging and rewarding high-tech skills in fields like avionics and electronics, satellites and microwave communications, computer and radar operations—just to name a few.

It makes sense to earn while you learn. For more information about getting money for college, contact your Army Recruiter today.
