

Should Oregon churches be required to pay unemployment taxes for non-cleric staff?

"No, I think that the church is separate. 'Separation between church and state.' They should not be seen as a business or required the same business obligations."

— Amanda Ross, freshman, theater arts

"I feel that any organization that receives federal funding or donations from members or the public should take responsibility to redistribute that money and contribute to society."

— Todd Gummer, junior, English

"Absolutely. They should have to pay. Despite the fact they are a non-profit organization, they have people working for them. If the church gets into financial trouble people are going to be unemployed."

— Ian Walker, graduate student, finance

"No, they shouldn't have to pay. It's separation of church and state. They should keep them separate from schools and other things. They should keep taxes out too."

— Glen Moe, freshman, undeclared

"I'd say 'no' because if people are going there for spiritual aid and they give money, the money shouldn't go back to the government."

— Doug Wuest, sophomore, undeclared

"No, because it becomes kind of an ethical issue. A church is there to help people it should not have to pay taxes."

— Shelley Wheeling, freshman, business
