

People ask me how I spend my nights," says Sandra Bernhard, almost wistfully. "Is it glamorous, Sandra? And I tell them, yes, in a way it really is. I begin with some freshening up in my bath, where I steam, scrub, and buff. Wednesday and Saturday, I shave my legs, usually in the afternoon."

"But on special occasions, I'll get up early and shave in the morning," she confides. "My most recent favorite evening at home included a crackling fire and listening to an old Heart album."

It is an early Wednesday morning in Chicago and Sandra Bernhard is running around her hotel room trying to juggle interviews, photo shoots, and the actual time she will make various book store stops. She flew in the night before from New York after performing an exhausting, off-Broadway, one-woman show called "Without You I'm Nothing" to a typically shocked, roaring, pleased, mind-boggled audience. On her days off, which are getting fewer and farther between, she is being hauled across the country to scribble her name and fondest wishes on her autobiographical, stream of consciousness book, "Confessions of a Pretty Woman."

The book could easily have been called "Confessions of an Industrious Woman." In the last 12 months, Bernhard has published a book that went through a reprint and captured the title role as a sadistic nurse in Nicholas Roeg's "Track 29." Add to the list a possible cable series and a probable first novel. She's also finishing a comedy album.

On this morning, she isn't the same shock to the nervous system that has been known to make David Letterman blush. She is not tormenting, teasing, flirting, throwing caution to the wind or shocking anyone. Now

Letting your laundry pile up is a college tradition. So is K-Swiss. Our fit, comfort and durability have made us a Classic since way back in 1968. Why, we're almost as old as some of your laundry.
