NCAA track hopefuls have last chance in Kelly Open

By Jack Millikin
Emerald Sports Reporter

For the record, call it the Dan Kelly Open.

Even if it is the last chance for Oregon athletes to qualify for the NCAA meet May 31-June 3, to call it the Last Chance Open, as it was named last year, might make it sound more like an ultimatum than a track meet.

According to women's track coach Tom Heinonen, the meet's competitors will likely fall into four basic categories.

The categories include the "tune-up," which will showcase distance specialists Liz Wilson and Danny Lopez as they help pace the hopeful qualifiers.

The "one-last-thing-at-Hayward-Field effort," to be given by a number of Oregon seniors.

The "post-collegiate springboard," from which former Ducks Annette Hand, last year's NCAA 5,000-meter champion, and Ranza Clark, also a consistent NCAA scorer in her collegiate days, will catapult themselves into bigger and better meets by giving the hopefuls a boost in the 1,500.

Then there are the hopefuls. Rosie Williams, the Pacific-10 Conference 200-meter champion, will head the list of potential Duck qualifiers, having fallen short of the NCAA qualifying mark at the Pac-10 meet last week at Stanford.

Her mark of 23.61 was good enough to give her a new school record and the Pac-10 crown, but was just short of the NCAA mark of 23.50.

"Our best chance for an NCAA qualifier is Rosie in the 200," Heinonen said. "It might be tough to run fast without the psyche of running in the Pac-10 meet, but as long as she runs north to south, she could break the standard."

Duck sprints/hurdles/jumps coach Mark Stream said feels that if she meets the standard

Oregon sprinter Rosie Williams heads the list of potential NCAA qualifiers Thursday night, as she will try to make the cut in the 200 meters. Williams fell just short of the 23.50 qualifying mark last week in the Pac-10 Championships at Stanford, setting a school record with a 23.61 timing.

in this meet, she should score at the NCAA meet."

Other Ducks are hoping to fare as well: 1,500-meter runners Jim Peterson, who qualified for last year's NCAA 1,500 by matching strides with ex-Duck and 1984 Olympic 800-meter gold medalist Joaquim Cruz, and Colin Dalton, who came within 35 hundredths of a second from the NCAA standard of 3:42.70 at the Oregon Invitational on May 13.
