from anywhere at anytime.

Her constantly being on the lookout even while she is not at work or intentionally doing research has paid off on several occasions. She recalls one incident that took place when she was out of the country.

While she was on sabbatical in London a few years ago, she learned that UT was going to produce the play Antigone.

The director had written to tell her what he was looking for, and she immediately hit the museums looking for sources of inspiration, she said.

But it was not in the museum that she found her inspiration for the main character; it was while strolling in Saint James Park, looking at ducks.

"The ducks were all black, antarrigon and white, the same color as the vases at the British museums," she said. "I had this terrific idea for makeup for Antigone by looking at these ducks, so I spent a couple of hours there sketching all the different feather patterns that they had."

After the research is done,

Bonds must design, select materials for and begin building these costumes.

It is during these stages that students who work with Bonds in her costume shop located in the basement of Villard Hall come into the picture.

Bonds said it was not always easy to get students to work

there was a safety problem."

Today, the costume shop is totally renovated and Bonds said she hopes this will inspire more students to become involved in costume building.

Bonds takes great pride in her work, and this can clearly be seen in the structure and quality of the costumes pro-with her in the costume shop because of the old sweatshop conditions that used to exist.

"It was pretty hard to get people to come and work in here before because it was such a dungeon," she explained. "In addition to being a miserable place, it also was not good for educational purposes and duced at the shop.

"For me, the art of constructing is just as important as the art of design or the art of acting," she said. "You can take great pride in that process, it's a sculpture and you want to put it together beautifully."
