AuCoin searches for old growth agreement

WASHINGTON (AP) — Northwest lawmakers presented a key House subcommittee chairman Monday with a plan they hope will break the impasse for loggers and environmentalists in Washington and Oregon.

The congressmen declined to discuss the plan in detail but they indicated it would require "expedited" court review of timber sales planned in Northwest's federal forests.

They also hinted it may include a slight drop in the sales level envisioned in earlier proposals.

"I'm not prepared to rush into anything," Illinois Democratic Rep. Sidney Yates, chairman of the House interior appropriations subcommittee, said after an hour meeting with Rep. Norm Dicks, D-Wash., and Rep. Les AuCoin, D-Ore.

AuCoin and Dicks are hoping to find a compromise that will protect the northern spotted owl and allow continued logging in the region's old-growth forests over the next year.

Northwest lawmakers consider Yates' support essential if they are going to gain the support of a House-Senate conference committee now scheduled to meet Wednesday and avoid a fight on the House floor.

Yates has been an outspoken critic of a Senate-passed plan that would prohibit federal courts from enjoining timber sales over the next year in forests known to contain spotted owls.

"I heard language that makes me hopeful we can come to an agreement," Yates said.

But Yates said he wasn't sure an agreement would be reached before the conference committee meeting.

"We are moving constructively, but I want to reserve comment," he said.

Lawmakers were searching for a compromise that would assure Northwest mills of a stable supply of timber over the next 12 months while the Fish and Wildlife Services decides whether the owl should be protected as a threatened species.

Environmentalists have launched an all-out lobbying campaign to defeat the Senate plan, which they charge would severely restrict their access to the courts.

Environmentalists have used courts to win injunctions that, at one point, halted more than half of the timber sales planned in the region's federal forests this fiscal year.

The timber industry supports the Senate plan but insists it will fail unless it includes restrictions on court appeals.

After the meeting, AuCoin said he was still unsure what it will take to satisfy Yates.

"We still don't know Yates' bottom line," AuCoin said. "There is some shadowboxing going on. We need chairman Yates' support, but he is not from a timber state and may not fully understand the stakes we are playing for."

AuCoin said that while he and Dicks were trying to fashion a compromise Yates could accept, they would be careful not to undercut the industry.

Dicks said the meeting was a "good, fruitful discussion. I remain optimistic we can get a plan."
