Lawmakers reject owl plan

WASHINGTON (AP) — Northwest lawmakers rejected a compromise plan offered by a key House subcommittee chairman Tuesday as a showdown loomed over legislation to protect the northern spotted owl and allow continued logging in the old-growth forests of Washington and Oregon.

Both sides agreed to meet again Wednesday morning in what could be a final effort to break the impasse before a House-Senate conference committee meets later in the day.

Illinois Democratic Rep. Sidney Yates, chairman of the House interior appropriations subcommittee, said he was still optimistic that an agreement could be reached that would avoid a conference committee confrontation. But some Northwest lawmakers didn't share his optimism.

"We may just have to take a vote in conference," said Rep. Les AuCoin, D-Ore.

Undeterred by the prospect of a House floor battle, Sen. Mark Hatfield, R-Ore., said he was not about to support a compromise that wouldn't protect the region's timber industry over the next 12 months.

"I don't think we should go through an exercise and charade if there is no meaningful and doable solution," Hatfield told reporters. "I'd rather go down in flames."

House Speaker Tom Foley, who would prefer to avoid a messy floor fight over a regional issue just months after he assumed the top leadership post, has been keeping close watch on the talks and was briefed Tuesday by AuCoin and Rep. Norm Dicks, D-Wash.

During a meeting with AuCoin and Dicks, Yates unveiled a plan that would have cut the timber sales level in the federal forests of the Northwest over the next year by almost 600 million board feet from the level envisioned in a Senate-approved plan.

And while Yates called for expedited judicial review of timber sales appeals, he would give the courts as long as 90 days to make a final decision on an individual appeal rather than the 30 to 45 days Dicks and AuCoin had called for.

The Senate plan would prohibit federal courts over the next year from enjoining any timber sales planned in the region's forests that provide habitat for the spotted owl.
