Senate decries killing

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate voted 99 to 0 Tuesday for a resolution condemning continuing violence on all sides in El Salvador and vowing to reconsider U.S. aid if the killers of six Jesuit priests are not brought to justice.

"Both the FMLN (leftist guerrillas) and the Salvadoran government must take strong action to end the violence that both sides seem to have taken against the innocent population," said Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell, D-Maine.

The non-binding resolution came a day after Congress refused to attach any restrictions on this year's $85 million in U.S. military aid to El Salvador, heeding President Bush's argument that such a move would undercut the new government of rightist president Alfredo Cristiani.

But Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., noted that "votes like yesterday's can be misinterpreted," and added, "This resolution makes clear that we deplore all violence in El Salvador, whether it comes from the extreme right or the communist left."

The comments were indicative of a growing restiveness in Congress with U.S. policy toward El Salvador.

"The question isn't what we think of the rebels," said Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., whose Appropriations subcommittee writes foreign aid legislation.

"The question is what we think of the ability of the existing policy to succeed. The very fact that the rebels have been able to do this after ten years of supporting the Salvador government demonstrates to me that that government is not nearly as in control of the military situation as they have indicated."

Added Rep. Dan Glickman, D-Kan.: "The extremists on both sides are driving this country into the sea. And in the meantime, U.S. citizens are starting to get affected by it. The president needs to personally get involved to get a cease-fire in place."

The Senate resolution was similar to a resolution passed a day earlier by the House, and stated "unequivocally" that if the government does not make a good-faith effort to apprehend and prosecute the murderers of six Jesuit priests and two apparent witnesses, "the Congress will carefully review and consider the question of aid to El Salvador."

"The military and those who may have been involved in some of these violent acts should understand that ... we're not necessarily going to be writing a blank check in perpetuity, and it's extremely important that President Cristiani understand this," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn.

Congress "may find it necessary to condition or curtail" future Salvadoran aid, he said.

The resolution also asked that the Bush administration report to Congress by Feb. 20 on the status of the investigation into those deaths.

Dole said Tuesday's guerrilla attack on a San Salvador hotel reaffirmed Congress' decision not to slap limits on the military aid for Cristiani's government.

As the Senate vote proceeded, police forcibly removed several protesters from the visitors' galleries who began shouting comments against U.S. policy. The entire gallery was cleared for the second time this week, something that has happened only twice before in this century.
