of going to a junior college." While Byrne isn't an NCAA administrator and doesn't have any answers that would make academic regulation clear-cut and uncontroversial, he is pleased the NCAA is doing something.

"We have to do something for the athletes," Byrne said. "Schools are famous for taking in an athlete, using up their eligibility and spitting them out."

Both Byrne and Gray are not sure how long Prop 26 will last. The recent changes have shown that the NCAA is still unsure of how to regulate academics at the Division I level. In fact, Prop 42 never really existed, as it was to be implemented on Aug. 1 of this year.

"The NCAA is famous for reconvening and changing their decisions," Byrne said. "If I knew what they were going to do next, I could make a lot of money. I would have liked to see them spend more time with (Prop) 48."

"I think it's a little too early to say what will happen for sure," Gray said.

Besides the modification of Prop 42 to Prop 26 last week, the NCAA lowered the number of Division I basketball games from 28 to 25 per season. Byrne said the decision will lead to schedule reductions in other sports.

"I think we'll see a reduction of play in non-revenue sports such as baseball, softball, volleyball and perhaps golf," he said. "There's been so much expansion in these sports that the student-athlete is involved in them nearly year-round."
