Jeannine Antoniou, a member of Clergy and Laity Concerned, speaks about her experiences with racism in Tennessee and South Africa.

Racism Continued from Page 1

Antoniou said CALC didn't accuse the mayor, but at the meeting, "the Southern hospitality left quickly."

The death galvanized the community, which signed a petition to its state congresswoman for an investigation, Antoniou said. However, the congresswoman, who knew about the appointment three months in advance, was not present when Suttles' daughter presented the petition.

The case has been placed on docket for the Tennessee Supreme Court, Antoniou said.

"I didn't go down to save the people of Chattanooga, but at some point in your life you've got to stand up for what you believe," she said.

"Racism explains our current foreign policy," she added, "which is to control the world with only seven percent of the world's population."

Antoniou also spent two months in South Africa in 1987.

"After six weeks I knew there was no way I could live there," Antoniou said.

Wherever she went, she was asked about sanctions imposed against South Africa.

"When I came back I couldn't talk about the experience," she said.
