be more of an 'us and them' situation, which we're trying to avoid."

Although Clark said more enforcement is an option to be considered, he didn't think enforcement was the key solution.

"I want to stray away from more enforcement," he said. "But it's an idea like all the others and we have to consider everything, especially what other schools in similar situations are doing."

Clark said the ASUO, the police and the community are looking for long-term solutions to student-police clashes.

"We are dealing with what just happened, but we also have to try to keep it from happening again," he said.

In the meantime, the ASUO is taking some immediate action. This weekend, Clark and three other students formed a student response team. They wore beepers and responded to eight parties that had generated complaints to the police department.

"We observed and advised the parties about the complaints, and we had really good responses from the students," Clark said. "None of the parties escalated to the point where the police had to respond."

Clark said the student response teams may continue until after May 5, when Cinco de Mayo festivities usually generate large parties. Then the teams would be evaluated to see if they should become permanent.

The ASUO is also sponsoring an open forum Wednesday at 3:30 p.m. in the Ben Linder Room to discuss student-police relations.

"This will be another step we'll take to try to improve the situation," Clark said.

Carroll urged University students and administrators and Eugene police to take seriously the options provided from other schools' experiences.

"Listen to us when we tell you not to take it from the approach of 'you do your thing, we'll do ours,'" he said. "If you really work together, you can find a solution that's agreeable to everyone."

able for students, especially for those under 21.

"The only event that occurs regularly is beer gardens," Partridge said. On-campus comedy nights or big-name concerts are possible diversions for students who might otherwise drink out of boredom, Partridge said.

Clark said ASUO is considering different ways to alleviate the tension between University students, Eugene police and the community, including mediation.

A community forum, to be held Wednesday at 3:30 p.m. will provide an opportunity for students and community members to suggest as many options as they can think of to improve student safety at parties and improve community relations, Clark said.

The forum is currently scheduled to take place in the Ben Linder Room but may be moved to a room that can accommodate more people.

Kirk Bailey, ASUO University affairs coordinator, said the forum will serve two purposes: finding solutions and providing a session where students can air any frustrations over what happened at Mill Street and 14th Avenue March 31.

"It definitely has to be a venting session," Bailey said. "But I hope it will be controlled and constructive."

is important for them to set goals and budget their time in order to be a successful law student, Haggerty said.

Learning enough to pass the bar exam is the most important goal a person should set for himself or herself after enrolling in law school, Haggerty said.

"You cannot practice law if you cannot pass the bar examination," he said. "If you look at yourself as a person you will succeed. If you look at yourself as a law student, you may not."

Haggerty also informed students that there is no such thing as a conspiracy to keep minorities out of the bar exams.

"People will tell you minorities can't pass the bar exam on the first try," he said. "If you do pass they say you were lucky."

Haggerty told students not to fool themselves when it came to budgeting time.
