Stull's strength lies in negotiating

By Birgit Schreiber Sivesind

Describing himself as a "people-oriented person," Incidental Fee Committee candidate Don Stull said he believes his ability to negotiate and compromise with people is a major quality he can bring to the committee.

Stull, a junior, said he plans to work with people on the IFC individually to see how he can best serve the committee as a whole.

Stull said he believes he can find people to fill child care work study positions who would be as qualified as a state employee.

Stull also feels the rising cost of tuition is a problem the University will face in the future.

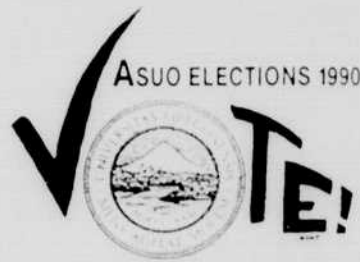

"The groups that are on this campus, because of the rise in tuition, are going to have to become more self-sufficient and more self-contained," he said.

When allocating funds to campus groups, Stull said he will consider three different criteria: the amount of student involvement behind the budget request; how and to whom the funds will serve the group or campus; and how to "maximize" the funds being requested.

The rhetoric and communications major said he has had no experience with student government or student government finance, but that he has had experience with running office finances.

Serving two years on the University's debate team, Stull said he learned the "fine art of taking one stance in one round, and in 15 minutes another stance on the same issue."

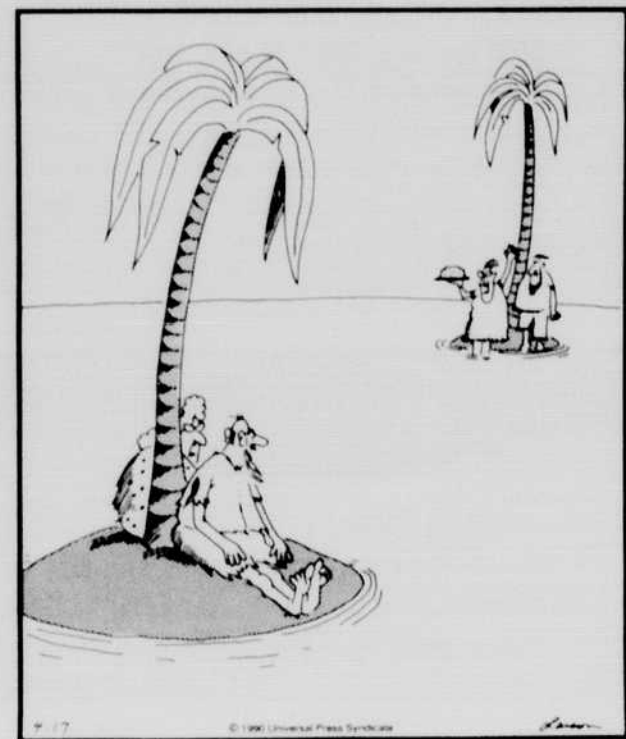

"I think that kind of flexibility is limited," he said. "Its best advantage to me is that I've been able to actually become much more involved on both sides of an issue."

Child care at the University is an issue Stull says he wants to address if elected to IFC.

Stull explained he would delay the hiring of state employees for child care and direct child care funding toward students through work study and subsidies.
