limit to create new funds for higher education.

She called the spending limit "an artificial lid" created by legislative members to appeal to taxpayers, and she said it is a bad government and business practice.

The spending limit, a statutory measure created in 1979, limits the state legislature's allocations to within 2 percent of the governor's estimated budget, and it keeps the growth of state spending from surpassing the rate of growth in personal income.

The measure also keeps the number of state employees to within 1.5 percent of the state's population.

With strong leadership from the governor, Roberts said she believes a future bill abolishing the spending limit could pass in the state senate and in the house.

But in Robert's meeting with leaders from various student groups, funding issues received only partial attention. Although Roberts talked about finances during a portion of this second meeting, students led the discussion toward questions on racial tensions and gay rights.

Roberts said she sees a "wake of hatred that is frightening," when asked about law enforcement and increasing race-based violence.

"In this state and on my watch, I'm not going to permit this," she said.

"We can send out the National Guard, but that's not going to change the situation," she said. "The problem is much deeper than that."

"We can start in the classroom," she added. "We are trying to teach kids about sex responsibility because we're afraid of AIDS ... We can teach them about other social dangers, and among them is racism."

When asked about her position on gay rights, Roberts reaffirmed her opposition to discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

"I will not accept discrimination in state government based on (sexual orientation). It is a non-factor as far as I am concerned."

"I have no intention of infringing on that issue," she said.

"I have spoken out on the issues, whether it's the handicapped and disabled, racial minorities, religious minorities, women or gays," she said. "I have been very clear about my positions."
