Hot hammer dulcimer band to perform

The Whammadiddle Dingbats play an inventive fusion of traditional and modern music. Their concerts feature the hammer dulcimer playing of Mick Doherty and Lawrence Huntley and the big rhythm guitar style of Kevin Shay Johnson.

The Dingbats play instrumental dance music, but it isn't the sort filled with electronic drums. Their sound comes from various American and European cultures and their repertoire includes Appalachian breakdowns, Irish jigs, dance tunes from the Andes and German polkas. The key to the Dingbat sound, the group said, is rhythm.

The dulcimers used by Doherty and Huntley are three-octave instruments played with two hand-held hammers and equipped with dampers.

Johnson and Doherty harmonize on modern folk songs such as Dillon Bustin's "Moonshine in the White Pines." For the vocals, Huntley takes up an electric bass, adding yet another dimension to the band's music.

The band, which has its roots in Portland, has received rave reviews from a variety of sources. Chris Nielson, host of the radio folk show "Root and Branch," said the Dingbats "are some of the finest folk musicians in Portland, which makes them some of the finest in the whole Northwest."

"Their performances are beautiful, exciting and funny," he added. "May they never be mellowed out by Windham Hill."
