Group emphasizes Southern roots

The Hokum Scorchers describe their music as having a "foot-tapping, jugband style," with heavy emphasis on 1920s Southern folk tunes.

The band, made up of Sunset Lou on guitar and Jeké Young on the washboard, said they have "a humorous edge, like a medicine show or vaudeville." They said they are influenced by early sources of Southern street music, such as the Memphis Jug Band, Tampa Red, Robert Johnson and the Mississippi Sheiks.

Having recently moved to Eugene from the South, Sunset Lou said he feels his new home is lacking in the type of music the Hokum Scorchers play.

"Ours is not filtered down at all, and we feel that we represent a unique era in Southern black music—namely 'hokum' style music that was once performed on the street," he said.

Scandinavian men promote their heritage

We sing of the Northland's heritage, the fatherland songs of praise to Scandinavia—to which we add, and to our own America!

A song from the Norsemen collection

The Norsemen of Eugene was organized in 1938 to further cultural and fraternal singing in the Eugene area. After a hiatus in the years of World War II, an application was submitted for membership in the Pacific Coast Norwegian Singers Association, now consisting of 11-member choruses ranging from Los Angeles to Vancouver, B.C.

The present director of the group is John Gustafson, a retired professor of music at the University. The all-male chorus, which is partially subsidized by the Sonja Lodge—Sons of Norway, works to promote the Scandinavian heritage through music.

Lodge membership is not a requirement to be included in the Norsemen. Present members are of Danish, Finnish, Swedish and other nationalities besides Norwegian, according to the group's press release.

Locally, the Norsemen entertain residents of nursing and retirement homes during December, and they also perform year-round at churches and group meetings. Another highlight of each year is the group's performance with the Thorsmen of Salem at the Scandinavian Festival in Junction City.

As members of the Pacific Coast Norwegian Singers Association, the Norsemen of Eugene joins the other choruses in the annual Sangerfest, hosted in rotation by the member choruses. The last Sangerfest held in Eugene was in 1983, and the group is now laying plans for another one in 1993.
