CO-OP

us would have preferred to see Co-Ed Housing rejuvenate itself."

SCA will become sole owner of a building that was originally designed as a sorority house in the 1920s and was operated as a co-op for the past 20 years, Roe said.

"They were out of money, out of membership and out of management," SCA business manager Tim Mixon said.

All three items are ones that SCA hopes to address when the house reopens this fall. SCA, which corporately holds both Campbell Club and Janet Smith cooperatives, has already begun soliciting members to run for board positions at the new house to ensure stability.

A quarter of a million dollars will go into the new acquisition, Mixon said.

"It's a steal," he said. Located directly across from campus at 1648 Alder, Mixon predicts the house will fill a great demand. "It was an exquisitely designed building," he said, noting its turret, circular staircase and hardwood floors.

SCA members will spend the summer cleaning the house and contracting out for the rest of the work, which Mixon admitted, is considerable.

The Eugene fire marshal requires that a new fire alarm system be installed to bring the building up to code, Mixon said. In addition, a new stairway will have to be built into the co-op's interior to provide easier access to the outside in case of fire, he said.

As a recently functioning cooperative, Parr Tower can easily be converted to accommodate group living, Janet Smith house president Dondi Ford said. A member of the SCA's expansion committee, Ford said that kitchen space was only one of the many variables confronting the group.

"This kitchen is bigger than most people's living rooms," Ford said.

Cooperatives helping one another also sweetened the pot, according to Mixon. SCA was given preference in negotiating with the ailing Co-Ed Housing, he said.

By assuming Parr Tower's outstanding debts and mortgage, SCA acquired the property for a mere $90,000, Mixon explained.

"Co-Ed Housing's commitment is to co-ops," he said. "So we can pick up the torch and carry on."

Hydrogen leak postpones shuttle launch

CAPE CANAVERAL (AP) — NASA scrubbed today's launch of Columbia and its $150 million observatory because of two hydrogen leaks and said repairs could delay liftoff until next week.

The 12:28 a.m. mission was postponed six hours before lift-off after sensors detected rising levels of hydrogen gas in Columbia's engine compartment during fueling of the rocket Tuesday with liquid oxygen and liquid hydrogen.

Although hydrogen is highly combustible, NASA spokeswoman Lisa Malone said "the vehicle was never in an unsafe position at any time." The seven astronauts on the all-scientific mission were to have boarded hours later.

Repairs are not expected to start until tonight, and it will be at least several days before launch, Malone said. All fuel must be drained from Columbia's big external tank before workers can return safely to the launch pad.

NASA engineers spent hours opening and closing valves and watching a network of sensors before finding the leaks about midnight. One was from a 17-inch valve in a pipe that carries fuel from the tank to the engines; the other was in ground equipment, Malone said.

Shuttles have three main engines that burn a propellant of oxygen and hydrogen. The propellant, chilled to a liquid, is loaded into the external tank about five hours before launch. The tank actually contains two vessels, one for the oxygen and one for the hydrogen. The two elements are combined in the rocket engines, where they ignite and produce thrust.
